The effect of nicotine-exposure during prepubertal developmental period on the responsiveness of the rat hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis to an L-Dopa challenge has been investigated. Nicotine administered at high and low doses during the prepubertal period affected the nocturnal profiles of plasma corticosterone and prolactin in adult female rats. To test whether the impaired pituitary function would be attributable to impaired function of the noradrenergic system, the effect of local administration of nicotine into the anterior third ventricle on L-Dopa-evoked plasma prolactin secretion was evaluated in adult female rats. Nicotine significantly inhibited the L-Dopa-evoked prolactin release in the prepubertal group. However, in the adult group, local application of nicotine had no effect. The results of this study demonstrate that nicotine administration impairs the function of the noradrenergic system in the prepubertal female rats. T-cell effector functions are regulated by specific signal transduction pathways. The Rho family small GTPases have been suggested to play an important role in this regulatory process. Here, we show that RhoB is mainly expressed in CD4(+) T-cell subsets and further study the role of RhoB in T-cell proliferation and differentiation. Our data indicate that ectopic expression of RhoB promotes T-cell proliferation. In addition, RhoB can suppress Th1 differentiation, while promote Th2 differentiation by regulating the expression of specific effector cytokines. Expression of RhoB inhibits the differentiation of naive T-cells into effector T cells, while promotes the formation of memory T cells. Thus, RhoB plays an important role in the regulation of T-cell differentiation. we decided that a grant of summary judgment was not appropriate and that the case should have proceeded to trial. It was our judgment that there were significant factual disputes as to the proper characterization of the notice letter, its contents, the basic function of the "180-day provision," and the interpretation of other provisions of the Rent Act itself. In view of the disputed issues of fact, the potential defendants were required to come forward with an accounting to prove that no damages had accrued. We note that the accounting was made by the plaintiffs-appellees-cross-appellants. 28 We are convinced that the District Judge did not reach the merits of the claim for damages. Plaintiffs have not challenged the District Judge's interpretation of the Rent Act and, in any event, the undisputed evidence showed that plaintiffs had failed to inform the "proper" person of the allegedly late payment, a necessary statutory precondition to suit. Moreover, plaintiffs were in default, and the landlord had not demanded rent and received none. The District Judge made no finding, nor do plaintiffs contest, that the landlord was entitled to summary judgment on its claim for accrued rent. The order in issue is properly
