Medical devices, such as catheters and the like, are commonly used to deliver therapeutic agents and other substances to interior regions of the body. A delivery device may be inserted into the body of a patient and guided through a patient's vasculature to a predetermined target site. A therapeutic agent may then be dispensed from the delivery device and delivered to the target site. Delivery devices typically comprise a body and a therapeutic agent delivery mechanism. In some cases, the delivery device may include a movable therapeutic agent delivery mechanism. The mov
