However, even with a 3D imaging device, image samples must still be collected from many different perspectives and many different regions of the field of view. These multiple perspectives can lead to very complex processing requirements and can thereby limit the ability of an operator to modify the visualization to a particular task. Sacral fractures are relatively rare injuries that frequently require surgical treatment. Surgeons have to decide whether to perform an internal or external fixation. The aim of this retrospective study is to compare the outcomes of patients with sacral fractures who were treated by external fixation with those treated by internal fixation. Patients were divided into three groups according to the location of the fractures: pelvic (S1-S3), sacro-iliac (S1-S3 + S-I), and lumbosacral (L4-S2). The correlations between the outcomes of the three groups were evaluated. The average patient age was 33.9 ± 1.2 years. Nineteen patients were treated by external fixation and 23 by internal fixation. The average follow-up duration was 50.4 ± 19.8 months (range, 24-120 months). The average Harris hip score was 84.4 ± 5.1, and the average ODI score was 11.0 ± 3.7 at the final follow-up. There were statistically significant differences in the outcomes between the groups. There were no differences in the complications between the groups. The external fixator can produce less pain and better function than internal fixation. It should be considered as a treatment option in selected patients with uncontained sacral fractures.
