“HyperMotion Technology provides an entirely new dimension to how we create gameplay,” said Peter Moore, vice president of product at Electronic Arts. “The power of a video game is moving characters, and the efficiency with which players animate in real-life situations and translate them into game play is, well, pretty unprecedented.” To put that in context, Moore points to the fact that FIFA Soccer 19, which was released in June 2017, was generated on a still-frame engine. While this adds a wealth of realism to gameplay, the engine does not capture player movement. However, FIFA 11 and 12 relied on a combination of motion capture and on-frame animation, giving players a combination of physiological movement of in-game character, while also providing an accurate depiction of movement. This approach still presents a level of realism that in-game players are unable to achieve. Compare that to the new approach to the on-field gameplay. Using data from 22 real-life players, the HyperMotion Engine captures a level of physicality that players simply cannot experience. The data reveals the relationship between movement and collisions and how an experienced pro players moves to different areas in the game. “This is not just what they do; it’s a simulation of what they do,” Moore said. “And it brings you closer to what you see in the game than anything we’ve done before.” During the most intense moments in a real-life football match, the motion capture data captures players’ quick and sweeping movements. The data is fed into the engine and then inputted into game players in real time. That means that if a defender receives the ball in a dangerous area and the pass is made, he is in real-life and moving to handle the ball. This is played out as that defender simulates contact with the ball, then moves into the expected position of where the player should be. “The player is in the game, in the action, with the characters and that’s what people want to see,” Moore said. “But they’re not in the middle of the action. And when it’s a defender you’ve got to make sure you simulate every possible way a defender could handle the ball. It’s not just a pass-back; it’s also a pass-back, faking a
