High resolution multiplex SNP assays for genome-wide association studies of immune complex disorders. Immune-mediated diseases are a class of disorders with strong genetic components that are clinically and biologically heterogeneous. It is now clear that genetic research using genome-wide association studies (GWAS) is beginning to identify genes that predispose to complex immune disorders. GWAS can identify common variants (minor allele frequency (MAF) > or =5%) that are associated with disease risk, but common variants only account for a small proportion of the genetic contribution to disease. We provide a multiplex SNP genotyping methodology optimized for high-resolution GWAS for immune complex disorders that offers a practical approach to the detection of common and low-frequency genetic variants. The method allows the simultaneous typing of a 1Mb region with a mean concordance >99% for directly genotyped SNPs and indirectly genotyped SNPs. The diverse roles of essential proteins are facilitated by their equally diverse function in bacteria. In turn, the basic techniques of molecular biology are allowing the structure and function of a diverse array of bacterial proteins to be characterized. The PI has applied the tools of genetics and molecular biology to the study of an essential (transformation-specific) phosphatase, UppP, from the pathogenic bacterium Yersinia pestis. Yersinia pestis is a Gram-negative, nonmotile bacillus that causes bubonic plague and pneumonic plague. Plague is a re-emerging disease of major concern because of the potential use of Y. pestis as a biological weapon. UppP is an essential protein that was identified by functional complementation of a Y. pestis upp mutant in a Upp+ E. coli strain. This complementation is due to a bacterial cytosolic, phosphatase activity that is dependent on a sequence in the N-terminal portion of the protein. The upp gene is induced during growth at 37 C, but not at 26 C or in the mouse. The studies
