It was dubbed the ‘straw that broke the camel’s back’. David Cameron became the first prime minister in a generation to suffer a Commons defeat and he was punished by having his new boundary reform voted on. It was a decision which contributed heavily to his election defeat that summer. The referendum in Scotland on having a new post-devolution Scotland had been called by Alex Salmond and the SNP-led government. But with the EU vote following shortly after, the very first general election I was going to cover was already taking place. This was the May 2010 election. It followed a hung parliament after the 2010 general election, in which the Conservatives lost their majority. As the then-new interim Speaker, I was delighted to see Nick Clegg and the Liberal Democrats, who had formed a coalition government with the Conservatives, become the first party to win an outright majority for the first time since 1974. The Liberal Democrats were elected on a promise of a referendum on the terms of any continued EU membership for the UK. It would be a clear referendum on continued membership of the EU – a situation which had not existed for nearly 40 years. This set-up would be used by the Conservatives when David Cameron called a national referendum on the EU in the following year. The Lib Dems were, in fact, hoping for a role in government of some kind – something which was to be denied them by the referendum which followed. Regardless of the referendum result, the coalition with the Conservatives would be the shortest-lived in British political history. It was called into being by the worst catastrophe to befall British politics since the conflict of civil war. It was a debt crisis which saw the British government enter into a relationship with the European Union called the ‘joint venture’. It is, frankly, a nearly uninterpretable term which now seems to be the price that Europe’s leaders have decreed of the British taxpayer. The 2010 election was not supposed to take place. After the collapse of an economic plan by Gordon Brown in 2008, some, in particular the Conservative Party, had wanted to force Brown to resign and form a new government. But that did not happen, and in the 2010 election the focus would be the economy. With the government’s ratings below 30 per cent, the Conservatives wanted to concentrate on the economic deficit. However,

It is to be expected when a player of Riker's caliber signs a contract extension. However, even the most faithful of observers of Star Trek: The Next Generation might not have expected the signing of Riker to extend to include a role in the animated series Star Trek: Voyager. Still, it has happened. Riker stars in Voyager as the holographic version of Jean-Luc Picard, the character he played so impressively in the original series. The character of Jean-Luc Picard appears in the episode "In Theory," from the third season of Voyager. The "In Theory" episode was originally meant to be a one-off, and had been conceptualized and written some time ago. However, when the writers decided to add a scene featuring the character of Riker's grandfather, they decided to keep the original scenes and incorporate the two characters to give the episode a larger story arc. At a certain point in the evolution of the series, it became clear the episodes would include more and more concept episodes. Since concept episodes take more planning and time, the writers decided it was best to give those films a spin-off series. So, when they decided they wanted to include Riker's grandfather in a concept episode, they decided to make it into a series that would include appearances from other familiar faces from the show. Riker's portrayal of his grandfather gave the writers an opportunity to include this character into the series. The voice work for Riker's grandfather has yet to be completed; however, Riker himself will voice the character in the first episode in the series. Since the character is a holographic one, Riker does not have to actually do any acting. In fact, he says the voice work is actually done before the writers work on the script. Riker's grandfather is played by an actor named Scotty. It was only last year that series creator Jeri Taylor decided to make the effort and fund a full CGI series of the characters on the show. As of yet, she has not mentioned Star Trek: Voyager in any of her interviews. If she decides to release a statement to that effect, we will be sure to post it here. There are a few minutes of footage from the recent Voyager Comic-Con appearances that can be viewed on YouTube. The end of the
