The effects of the diode laser on the anterior segment of the monkey eye were evaluated by measuring the vitreous and anterior chamber depth, intraocular pressure, corneal thickness, and intraocular lens (IOL) position. The posterior edge of an IOL was centered with the aid of slit-lamp examination. The laser energy was adjusted to deliver 300-500 degrees of retinal coagulation, sparing the ciliary body, the pars plana, and adjacent retina. Laser irradiation of the ciliary body for retinal coagulation resulted in intravitreal hemorrhage. Retinal coagulation was well localized to the arcuate or midperipheral retina in all 16 eyes tested. There were no significant changes in vitreous or anterior chamber depth or in intraocular pressure. There was minimal localized melting or scarring of the ciliary body and no significant increase in the anteroposterior or transverse dimensions of the posterior lens capsule or bulge. Approximately 45 degrees of uveoscleral depression was noted with an average choroidal thickening of 110 microns. There was less than 1 mm of transscleral movement of the IOL.Q: How to create multiple shards in GCP with Kubernetes? Let's say I have 10 brokers.
