The carotid artery is the main blood vessel that supplies oxygenated blood to the head, neck and face of a human being. The carotid artery is a trunk artery, and the common carotid artery is one of the two main branches of the carotid artery. Arteriosclerosis is the plaque-forming process of all arteries of a body. Arteriosclerosis affects the carotid arteries as well. The disease causes narrowing of the arteries and reduction of the blood flow through them. Symptoms of carotid artery disease include (1) headaches, (2) neck pain, (3) neck swelling, (4) voice problems, (5) dizziness, (6) facial pain, and (7) loss of coordination. It may also lead to stroke and heart disease. Arteriosclerosis includes thickening of the intima of the arteries, loss of elasticity of the artery walls, and hardening of the arteries as a result of a build-up of plaque. It is believed that carotid artery disease causes between 30-50% of all strokes in the United States. According to a method disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 7,159,824, a stent is advanced along a catheter, through a body vessel, until the stent engages a desired portion of the vessel. The stent is expanded by a balloon (or similar device) against the vessel wall, and the balloon and catheter are withdrawn from the stent. When the stent is inserted, a dilatation balloon is introduced to the stenosed or partially occluded site. The balloon is inflated to perform a dilatation of the stenosis, by both the inflation of the balloon and the radial force generated by the expanding stent. However, there are some drawbacks of the prior art. The use of balloon catheters can not provide the optimal anchoring force in the target portion of the vessel wall. Due to the shortcomings of the prior art, the intimal thickening caused by arteriosclerosis can not
