However, the service is not closing the door on fuel cells as a technology, Andrew Deyoe stated. “Neither rail-powered nor helicopter-powered solutions are mutually exclusive to fuel cell-powered solutions,” the Maj. stated. The Pentagon is growing increasingly concerned about its reliance on foreign sources of petroleum. And as the dust settles on recent events in the Middle East, the land service is shying away from its dependence on foreign sources. Plus, rising fuel costs are likely to lead to an increase in foreign ownership of the U.S. military. The Navy may follow in the Army’s footsteps, and put away its gas-powered amphibious ships for a rail fleet.
