Â The "French (1+2) Version" CD can be used only for personal use, and may not be used for commercial applications. This is the single language version.. data in the model. In more detail, since a large number of samples are required in order to make the model converge, only a small set of them is initially used. As time passes, the learning rate will decrease and thus the size of the set is gradually increased. We use a learning rate of 0.001 in all of our experiments. This setting is a common setting in deep learning applications. Variable Importance for Dimensionality Reduction A typical problem in statistics and machine learning is dimensionality reduction. Dimensionality reduction can be viewed as a project of reducing the number of features of the data, or, from a machine learning perspective, to map the original high-dimensional data to a low-dimensional data. However, by doing this, the original data becomes noisy. An example is shown in Figure 1 (figmoon05). The left image shows the original data, and the right one shows the data after dimensionality reduction. It can be seen that the right image contains the original data more precisely, as there are fewer distracting objects. However, when the data is visualized, it is still difficult to determine which data points belong to the original data. Therefore, we propose a method for variable importance for dimensionality reduction. In the experiment, we generate 100 2D moons from the 3D-SRE dataset. The total number of samples is 36,000. We apply the 3D-SRE method on the data and obtain the data on the left side in Figure 1 (figmoyn05). Then we apply the proposed variable importance method to the data. The left image in Figure 1 (figmoyn05) shows the original data, while the right one shows the data after applying the variable importance method. We can see that the variable importance method can help us to reduce the complexity of the original data by finding some of the most important variables. For example, in the right image, we can see that the shapes and the sun position are the two
