The unprecedented lawsuit against the district -- filed in 2010 by three Stockton Unified parents in an attempt to prevent the district from contracting out its school busing service -- sought to recover millions in lost wages and damages to the district in its unsuccessful bid. It was the highest-ever verdict against the district, and could have ramifications for school districts across the country that have sought to reduce costs by outsourcing. The Stockton district had tried to outsource its school busing about a decade ago, but the district said if the contract were awarded, the district would have been placed in a weaker position in terms of budgeting its transportation program and ensuring safe transportation services. The litigation was almost entirely based on lost wages to contract employees. The district had tried to outsource the work to San Diego-based Transdev, but the district said because Transdev was not a school district itself, the district would not have been able to meet the required level of communication and service.
