study, please take a look at the videos in the appendix below. Appendix D. Directed Curriculum Adoption + Implementation Photo Essays {#S46} =====
===== Student write-ups: Students took photos of themselves (Figure 10{ref-type="fig"}) or of their own family (Figure 11{ref-type="fig"}) using their devices. These photos were uploaded to Photowalk. Each write-up began with a title card (Figure 12{ref-type="fig"}). They presented a small report on an anthropological approach to understanding their own and others' social environments, and the effects of cultural norms, in order to help create a clearer picture of their lives. Students wrote about the photographs and stated what they found most interesting about the images, describing what patterns they noticed. Students also explained what they wanted others to know about themselves and their families. Lesson plans: Each lesson included the student write-up, Photowalk images, and the student contribution to the project. Following each instance of a photowalk, students received a handwritten note from a fellow student and a digital photo (Figure 13{ref-type="fig"}) and a verbal feedback report (Figure 14{ref-type="fig"}) from a mentor. Mentors also posted feedback to the group forum during class, and occasionally during the photowalk. The lesson plans can be found in the appendix below. Appendix E. Photojournal Prompts {#S47}

We collected the same images in each iteration, and students described their reactions to the individual photographs. These responses were then shared with the entire class. We ended class with a review of the key concept, focusing on students' individual opinions and how that changed in the second iteration. The following prompt was also used in the classroom: "Take a look at some of your family photos. At least one of them may remind you of an old photo you've taken of yourself. Why do you think this photo reminds you of yourself, and in what ways has it changed month, Cleveland police identified five young people who were either hit or tortured and killed in broad daylight, making them the latest in a rash of more than 20 animal-related homicides in the past decade. Couples, one dog, one cat, two birds and other small animals were killed by unattended, abandoned dogs. Some of these dogs were so possessed by the demonic spirits of the evil that they had taken possession of them that the owners could not pull them back by their collars and were forced to shoot and kill them in their yards. Until recently, the number of human "similar-to-animals" killings never garnered the amount of media attention that the number of animal-related incidents do. However, the publicity over the past several years about thousands of issues involving animals in custody, puppy mills and e-commerce have fueled an unprecedented public interest in animals and prompted local and national lawmakers to enact laws to protect animals. Animal rights advocates argue that these reforms have failed to achieve the ultimate goal — ending the killing of animals in confinement or for fun. Now is the time to apply laws intended to limit the killing of animals in a humane and effective manner. It's also a time for hunters and other gun owners to temper their joy with a moment of respect for the souls of the nonhuman animals whose bodies are being used to do so. "How far we are from animal-friendly America is evident by the rate at which the
