Make basic adjustments to images Yes, there are better tools for basic image editing. Yes, other types of applications may work, too, but Photoshop is designed specifically to handle photographs. It has the ability to automate the process for most operations; it makes it extremely easy to move objects, resize, change colors, change contrast, and perform other changes to images. Photoshop is also the best tool for placing objects or moving text inside of an image. Some designers prefer the Photoshop interface. With the capability of having objects of different colors and sizes placed within an image, this is the ideal application to create an image that looks like a real object. A new CMYK printing technique is also supported by Photoshop. Although Photoshop has many more features than other tools, all photographs and illustrations are created using it. If you're an experienced designer, you may not want to use Photoshop to create all your work. However, if you're an inexperienced designer, or someone who only needs to make basic images or take a few simple steps to get the work done, using Photoshop may be the most time-efficient way to make the changes necessary.

Modern inventory systems, such as those in warehouse, retail or manufacturing environments, face significant challenges in facilitating fast, flexible and accurate responses to fluctuating inventory demands. Inventory systems can make use of a variety of techniques when resolving supply/demand issues. Such techniques can include cascading floor level replenishment of items, stocking components, and/or local (e.g., aisles, pick-to-pick) resupply of items to maintain or increase inventory. However, these techniques are primarily reactive in nature, and are typically best suited to maintain or increase inventory levels during low demand periods. After determining that an item should be replenished, for instance, typical techniques will then proceed to attempt to immediately replenish and distribute items on a purely time and/or business rules-based schedule. Further, while such techniques are typically very granular and distributed with respect to available inventory, there exists no centralized communication or control of inventory levels and/or their utilization. Accordingly, there is a need for improved methods and systems that allow for proactive/participatory management of inventory and/or resources by use of an omni-channel system that minimizes downtime and helps operators respond to customer requests more quickly.1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to an apparatus and method for forming polyvinyl chloride by cooling partially polymerized crude polyvinyl chloride. More particularly, the invention relates to a method and apparatus wherein compressed air is employed to stir and cool the partially polymerized polymer. 2. Prior Art Methods for the continuous production of polyvinyl chloride are well known and include the preparation of polyvinyl chloride in an aqueous suspension by the suspension polymerization of vinyl chloride and in a gaseous state by the gas phase polymerization of vinyl chloride. The former method typically is employed for the production of relatively low molecular weight polymers, while the latter method is employed to make relatively high molecular weight polymers. It is known to employ a method of cooling partially polymerized crude polyvinyl chloride in order to form a solid plastic. This method of cooling is disclosed in co-pending application Ser. No. 712,838 filed Jan. 21, 1985. The method is characterized by using a screw conveyor to carry the partially polymerized crude polyvinyl chloride through a cooling zone in which the temperature is maintained at a level sufficiently low to prevent the polymer from sticking to itself or other surfaces or in the parts of the cooling apparatus. In this method
