In a 44-page report, the riot policing review team states that the death toll was in fact considerably lower than many suggested, and says that the problems of social alienation and other underlying causes were not addressed with any "serious vigour or clarity". It also says that the early police response was "too slow, timid and too tight". The report, which is the most detailed and official account to date of the huge disorder which erupted in the capital last summer, was written by Professor Alan Billingsley, a former chairman of the Policing Board, at a cost of about £180,000. Its publication is greeted with deep scepticism by commentators who say it says nothing new and is not likely to alter government policy or the police response to future disturbances. It may even fuel anger at the way the police handled the crisis, which the report says took too long to react to the unfolding events. "This report says absolutely nothing of substance," one officer said. The prime minister, Tony Blair, has said that he was satisfied with the response to the riots, and his cabinet ministers and senior police officers have also praised the way the police handled the affair. David Blunkett's office has said that the report is not due to be released until next week, and that no decisions have been taken on 648931e174
