The following video is an introduction to the development of FIFA 22's hypermotion technology: During a full-length high-intensity football match, players will perform a range of actions and movements, some of which will not be possible in a typical match. For example, a player will be able to perform precise sprints, drag-backs, slaloms and delicate movements such as feints and chest passes. More physical moves such as climbing the walls and powerful tackles will also be possible. One other area in which 'player physics' will be a big focus is in the changing of position on the pitch, such as when a player is taken down. FIFA will include the new 'physique' system, which allows for very dynamic animations to occur during football tackles and falls. Playing with friends against a perfect AI will be completely different. As well as these crucial additions, the new game engine and PC physics systems will provide a much more authentic and responsive experience, which have been an area where FIFA has struggled in the past. Although the new engine and physics engine have been in development for several years, they are now entering the final stages, providing an incredible new quality of life for players. These are just some of the many innovations and features you can look forward to in FIFA 22. And if you want to learn more about other gameplay and technical improvements, make sure to check out my FIFA preview here. Want to know more?
