Telangiectasias and small vascular malformations. Telangiectasias are dilated cutaneous venules and capillaries that protrude above the skin surface. They are caused by a localized blood dyscrasia, as evidenced by the presence of small vessels with intraluminal thrombi, in most cases. Telangiectasias are classified on the basis of their location (perioral, periorbital, perioral-periocular, periungual, and genital), size (macro, medium, micro, and very tiny) or etiology. Deep and superficial telangiectasias have a different embryologic origin, whereas both the primary and secondary forms are genetically heterogeneous. Telangiectasias may be a clinically important dermatologic finding in the differential diagnosis of many skin disorders, such as eczema, and can influence physical appearance and quality of life. U-M researchers advance genetic understanding of diseases University of Michigan researchers have developed a new method for predicting, at the molecular level, how a substance — in this case, the Parkinson's-related neurotoxin 1-methyl-4-phenyl-1,2,3,6-tetrahydropyridine (MPTP) — gets into the brain and then disrupts motor functions — a discovery that could lead to new therapies for Parkinson's and other movement disorders. In collaboration with the lab of Jeffery K. Baker at Michigan State University, the researchers used a unique mouse model that bears mutations to the gene that codes for the dopamine transporter (DAT), the protein that neurons use to remove dopamine — a chemical messenger in the brain that controls movements. With these mice, they administered MPTP through the mouse's feeding tube. They were able
