TOOLS TOOLS TOOLS TOOLS.Q: realloc to shrink array I want to know if it is possible to realloc to shrink an array (in a specific memory region). In my current code I want to allocate memory to an array, but if I want to realloc the memory for the array, I want it to shrink to the point before it was reallocated. I want to do this, because the array I'm allocating for requires more memory, than I know beforehand. A: I want to know if it is possible to realloc to shrink an array (in a specific memory region) The most obvious way I can think of is to call realloc() twice: `char *pointer = malloc(original_size); // do work size_t new_size = original_size; if (new_size > MAX_ARRAY 1cdb3666d`
