Roblox allows players to create any game they can imagine by coding it with Lua, a simple-to-use programming language. Users can choose from game development tools, game engines, and platforms to suit their needs. Because of Roblox's open API, games for Roblox can be created from any programming language, including HTML5, Java, and C#. With the creation of games comes a social element: users can chat with each other and comment on, create, and play other's games. Over 23,000 games of all kinds are available for users to play right now, created by talented artists, developers, educators, and other hobbyists. And I am not going to give up until I have a program set up that will allow me to stream my game on a website. The idea being that any visitor of my website will just have to point and click to be able to instantly play the game I have just created. A: Black Box is a game streaming service. They broadcast a website that encodes the video directly from the game. You then connect to it with the in-game browser. It is completely free. They were purchased by Ubisoft, which has been hosting Steam sessions through it. This is not cheap, but you can encode it yourself fairly easily. A common technique for streaming games is to have a streaming server - you have one server that all the players connect to. So the server will stream the gameplay to the players. You can also use UDP to stream games. It is not as reliable as TCP but can handle large amounts of data. Just be careful when opening large files on UDP. A: A few months ago I built a game streaming solution. It's still fairly new, and there's not too many websites using it, but it should be good enough for what you want. It's not free, but it doesn't require too much server power, and it's completely open source. I recommend that you use XSplit to encode your video and stream it. It's really easy to use and has a simple javascript API. Hope this helps, if not, feel free to drop a comment and I'll try to help. Marco.
