on the basis of this study, the interaction of mercury with cr-containing alloys is one of adhesion and then of wetting at room temperature, and the mercury film thickness on cr steel is found to be on the order of several micrometers. two main mercury-related corrosion reactions are inferred from the results: the formation of

a thin film of mercury that acts as a barrier preventing penetration of corrosion reagents, and the diffusion of corrosion reagents through the mercury film into the metal matrix. the formation of the mercury film is found to be dependent on the chemical composition of the steel, and is more favorable on the cr-rich alloys. the diffusion of corrosion reagents through the mercury film is found to be dependent on its thickness and on the chemical composition of the steel, and is more favorable on the cr-rich alloys. it is important to note that the corrosion behavior of the alloys studied is greatly influenced by the presence of hg, and that the absence of any hg increases the corrosion rate of cr steel. is this the ultimate of gatsby? with the help of jack and
